

This is a detailed architectural line drawing of a Gothic cathedral facade, presented as a symmetrical plan or elevation split vertically down the center. The drawing is rendered in black ink on a light, textured background. The central feature is a large rose window with a complex tracery design. Below it is a large, pointed archway. The facade is flanked by two tall, slender towers, each with a pointed spire. The towers have multiple levels of windows and decorative elements. The drawing is highly detailed, showing the intricate tracery of the windows and the structural elements of the facade. A vertical crease is visible down the center, indicating it was once a single sheet of paper.